ScribeVision™ systems automatically collect and analyze data that are reported by remote users. The system shown above is providing real-time information on remote user locations and operational status to emergency managers in a central command cell. The system automatically prepares mission-specific graphics based on remote user input. The touch screen display allows emergency managers to drill down from the graphic user interface to the specific data that contributed to the analyzed report.

A Proven Solution

ScribeVision™ systems have been in use by the United States military since 1999, providing web based command and control to military commanders during peacekeeping assignments and combat training missions worldwide. ScribeVision Technologies, Inc. is now making this proven solution available for use in Homeland Security, Civil Defense and Law Enforcement applications. The same design specifications that make ScribeVision™ an indispensable tool to the military also make it a logical solution for emergency managers, first responders and civilian authorities.

ScribeVision™ systems help to streamline voice and data communications to and from emergency response personnel in the field while increasing the availability, portability, and automated collection and dissemination of information critical to emergency management. ScribeVision™ systems include comprehensive emergency management applications, portable wireless solutions for first responders and field agents, automated fax, voice and e-mail solutions for emergency public and interagency communications, and document storage and retrieval capabilities.

Infinitely Flexible

ScribeVision™ systems provide a centrally managed mission-specific command and control platform for civilian emergency managers and law enforcement personnel. The system is designed to initially provide agencies only those features needed for their current mission while allowing them to add functionality at any time should their mission change.
